At 4 a.m., thirteen-year-old Albert walks quietly down the street. He is not alone; over two hundred people are with him. There are families, mothers with babies, and young children like Albert. They come from different countries in South America and are traveling on foot across the country. They all share the same idea of going to the US.

They walk eight to twelve hours every day without taking a break. They even sleep on the street and wash their clothes in the river. Sometimes there is enough food; sometimes there is no food at all. The trip is difficult, but many people still choose to do it. For them, this may be their only chance to make their lives better.

Like many people, Albert left his home and family not because he wanted to, but because life back in his country made him do so. Working in another country is the only way to make enough money to raise his family. The American dream comes in different ways. To Albert, it is to find a job, work hard, and create a brighter future for his family.
